

The Power of Denial
Arthur Miller's Life and Times
By Jerry James

*"I have never been able to separate public and private.
The way you live your life has consequences for the way everyone else lives his life."*
—Arthur Miller

Arthur Miller (1915-2005)

The Great Depression of the 1930s made Arthur Miller who he was. It made him a titan of mid-20th century theatre, a champion of liberal causes and a man who risked prison by refusing to name names to the House Committee on Un-American Activities (HUAC).

It also made him emotionally constricted, self-centered and—for one whose plays insisted that attention must be paid—remarkably able to deny reality when it was useful.

Drawing on his Depression experiences, his best plays feature a father with a failure in his past—a failure whose existence has long been denied—and a pair of brothers, one favored and one not. Arthur Miller escaped the Depression. But at what cost?

Childhood

Arthur Miller and his Mother

Arthur Asher Miller was born into a well-off Manhattan Jewish family on October 17, 1915. His father Isadore owned Miltex Coat & Suit. Young Arty was an indifferent student, unlike his brother Kermit, three years his senior. Then came the Crash of '29, two weeks after Arty's bar mitzvah. Although Isadore Miller kept his firm, Kermit had to drop out of college to work in it. The family was forced to move to Gravesend, far out in Brooklyn. There, Arty, who worked at odd jobs, took in the lessons that accompanied failure to succeed under capitalism.

His schoolwork continued to be mediocre, and after graduation, Arty took a job in a warehouse. But he also applied to the University of Michigan. (A neighbor went there.) He was summarily rejected. For most young men of the era, that would have ended things. Arty, however, denied the rejection. He wrote a letter to the Dean of Admissions, asking for a chance. The Dean relented, and Arthur Miller's life was changed. But in the back of his mind, there always remained the nagging guilt that he had fled "his ruined father, his devastated mother and his sacrificial brother," as Martin Gottfried put it.

The Young Writer

Arthur, Mary and Jane Miller

Art Miller arrived at college a year older than most of his classmates. As he worked three jobs to pay his way, he noticed that every year, Michigan offered the Hopwood Prize (in cash) in various writing disciplines. In his second year, despite never having written a play, Art decided he would compete for the prize in playwriting. A play "seemed more tangible," he later said. No Villain, heavily influenced by Clifford Odets, won $250 ($4,785 today) in 1936. The next year, with the aid of a professor, he won New York's Theatre Guild Bureau of New Plays prize of $1,250 ($24,127 today) with a revised version.

After graduation, Art moved back to Brooklyn. His plays were rejected by producers (including the Theatre Guild), so he survived by writing for radio. When the draft threatened, he married his college girlfriend, Mary Slattery. After Pearl Harbor, he took a draft-exempt job at the Brooklyn Navy Yard, working nights and writing days. His first Broadway play, The Man Who Had All the Luck (1944) closed after four performances. Devastated, Art promised himself that if his next play failed, he would give up playwriting. Fortunately, that next play was sent to Elia Kazan.

Kazan & HUAC

Elia Kazan & Arthur Miller

Elia Kazan came up with the leftist Group Theatre in the 1930s, playing roles in plays by Odets. Later success as a Broadway director led to Hollywood. He and Miller shared similar experiences of the Depression and capitalism. Kazan was even a one-time member of the Communist Party. Art Miller now presented him with All My Sons, suggested by a story Mary's mother had told him. It featured a father with a long-denied failure, a favored son and an unfavored son.

All My Sons (1947) won the NY Drama Critics Circle Award. The Miller family would never want for money again. Art and Mary bought a home in Brooklyn Heights and a country place in Connecticut. Perhaps feeling guilty about profiting from capitalism, Miller supported many progressive causes, including the 1949 Waldorf World Peace Conference, widely seen as a Communist front.

Miller and Kazan's next play would be Death of a Salesman, for which there were several sources. Arty had a grim job one summer, carrying a salesman's samples around the Garment District. Art had an unpleasant encounter with his Uncle Manny, a salesman, outside a Boston theatre. And Kermit Miller, having returned from the war with PTSD, became a salesman, remaining one for the rest of his life. Of course, the play featured a father with a long-denied failure and two sons, one favored, one not. Death of a Salesman (1949) won the Pulitzer Prize. Garson Kanin observed that after the play opened, Art Miller "became Arthur Miller." He also denied his past, painting himself as a prole born in Harlem, exempt from military service because of a football injury, and speaking with a Brooklyn accent.

There seemed to be no limit to what Kazan and Miller might do. Then came HUAC. When Kazan publicly testified before the committee in April 1952, he named names. Miller would not speak to him again for ten years. Instead, he wrote The Crucible (1953). It denounced a literal witch hunt, rather than HUAC's metaphorical one. Miller, however, deftly denied the play was about HUAC by refusing to confirm it was. (Today, The Crucible is the most produced of Miller's works.) Next came the one-act version of A View from the Bridge (1955). Its main character, Eddie Carbone (whose name echoes Elia Kazan) is an informer with, yes, a long-denied failing. The cast features a pair of brothers. (Miller would later expand the play into a full-length version.)

When Arthur Miller was finally called to testify before HUAC in 1956, he faced a possible year in prison. But he did not name names. Instead, he denied HUAC's power by changing the subject. Meeting with reporters at the lunchtime recess, he announced he was going to marry Marilyn Monroe. (Miller would be tried, convicted and sentenced, but on appeal, the sentence would be reduced to one month, suspended.)

Marilyn

Marilyn Monroe & Arthur Miller

Numerous books can furnish the details on what Life called, “The most unusual marriage since the owl and the pussycat.” A few facts: In 1951, Elia Kazan introduced Miller to Monroe. In 1955, Mary Miller threw him out. In 1956, Miller and Monroe married.

The Misfits (1961), based on Miller’s experiences in Reno while waiting for his divorce from Mary to become final, was written for Monroe. “I just thought it would be a terrific gift for her,” he later said, “because she’d never had a part in which she was supposed to be taken seriously. And she really wanted to do that.” Instead, it led to their breakup. In 1961, they divorced. While on location, Miller had met the photographer Inge Morath. They would marry in February 1962 and remain married until her death in 2002. Monroe died in August 1962. For the rest of Miller’s life, he would refuse to answer questions about her.

What now for Arthur Miller? His stature grew worldwide, especially in England. But it would take Elia Kazan to get his next play out of him. There are many stories about how the rift between them was bridged. One says that Marilyn Monroe forced their hands together at a party. Or perhaps it was being offered the honor of writing the play that would open the Repertory Theater of Lincoln Center, founded in the vain hope of creating an institution equivalent to England’s National Theatre.

After the Fall (1964) was intended as an earnest, honest examination of one man’s tortured life. But that life included characters obviously based on Miller, his three wives and Kazan. True to form, Miller denied everything in an article for Life. No one believed him. Instead, After the Fall became fixed in popular culture as, “That play where Miller spit on Marilyn’s grave.”

After After the Fall

“Playing for Time”

Miller’s last play to enter the standard repertoire was The Price (1968), written in the father-failure-brothers template. Afterwards, Miller wrote more than a dozen plays, but none were successful in the US. However, his CBS teleplay, Playing for Time (1980), adapted from a memoir about the Women’s Orchestra of Auschwitz, won four Emmys, including one for Miller’s script. In England, his new plays won awards—and Death of a Salesman was voted the second-greatest play in English of the 20th century. (Waiting for Godot was first.)

Deny Monroe as Miller might, he could never shake her. It was said that as president of the writers’ group PEN International (1967-69), Miller saved the life of a future Nobel laureate, Nigerian Wole Soyinka, because that country’s dictator recognized him as the man who had married Marilyn Monroe.

Then there was Miller’s last play, Finishing the Picture (2004). It detailed the struggle to complete a movie being shot in Nevada with a female star who was mentally ill and deeply into drugs. Arthur Miller died on February 10, 2005, denying to the end that the play was anything but fiction. Nothing to do with any real people, living or dead. He denied it.

Jerry James has been working in the theatre for nearly sixty years. For forty of those years, he lived in New York City, where he was an award-winning writer and director.
